Firm may have to clean up

By Kimberly Heinrichs

The state does not have to abide by an old agreement that would let a Fontana chemical firm off the hook from further cleanup, a panel of appeals court justices has decided.

The 4th District state Court of Appeal upheld a lower court decision earlier this month reversing a 1986 agreement that would have lifted responsibility for extensive cleanup from the shoulders of ChemWest Industries Inc.

The company has not decided whether it will ask the appeals court to reconsider or take the matter on to the state Supreme Court, ChemWest attorney Jose Allen said.

According to state law, the company must ask for the appeals court review within 15 days of its filing Feb. 3, said deputy attorney general Donald Robinson, who argued the health department's case. It has 10 days to seek a Supreme Court review from the day the decision becomes final — which is 30 days after filing, he explained.

ChemWest, which sits on Kaiser Steel Resources Inc. property along San Bernardino Road, was included in the state Superfund cleanup of the old steel mill in October. However, state Department of Health Services officials will meet today to discuss a possible severing of the two projects, department spokesman Jim Marxen said.

The plant once recycled steel waste in evaporation ponds atop Kaiser's slag piles. It sent millions of gallons of toxic pickle liquor sludge into the ground during spills in 1978 and 1983. The ponds are now closed.

Harry D. Miller, a former San Bernardino County deputy district attorney, signed an agreement for the state that would have required ChemWest to remove the liquid and solid

Thomas Domiani of Ontario poses with one of the Indian figures he created. The piece is part of an authentic Indian village

Artist recreates Indian village

By Paula Monarez

Thomas Domiani wants to leave a tribute to the American Indian.

Fascinated with preserving the culture for future generations, the Ontario artist has etched his emotions through sculpture, painting, wood carvings and iron castings.

Domiani has spent most of his time creating sculptures, clothing, accessories and everything else associated with Native Americans.

Recently he completed his most prized possession, an authentic rendition of an Indian village.

"I want to tell the true-life story of the American Indian," said the 63-year-old artist. "I want to show how he truly lived — the hardships and the triumphs."

Indian art hasn't been his only creative endeavor. Domiani has also designed fountains for grand hotels, religious statues for famous churches and art pieces for museums across the country.

At the Madonna Shop in Upland, his artwork depicting the various California missions is presently on display.

His best known piece is right here in Southern California.

In 1957, he began a five-year project for Walt Disney. Many people know it today as the Pirates of the Caribbean ride at Disneyland.

"It was the biggest thing I had ever done," Domiani said. "I made the heads, hands and feet. That was a milestone in my life."

Until 1947, Domiani never knew he was an artist.

"I was out of work and had been hired for a job in Chicago," he said. "Before my trip, a man came into my mother's restaurant wanting to hitch a ride to Chicago. I didn't know who this man was so I asked for references. He told me he had been making piggy banks locally. I decided to visit the shop and learn more about the man. I was so fascinated with the work the owner was doing that I forgot why I was there."

Domiani decided to invest his own money into the business and began selling piggy banks.

"There was a tremendous demand for them," he said.

Soon after things soured and Domiani and the owner parted.

"He thought I was trying to take his business away from him," Domiani said.

For several months Domiani brooded. Finally his mother loaned him money to open an artist studio.

"I wanted to do religious statues, I was very excited about having my own studio," he said. "But I forgot something very important. When I finally sat down to work, I realized I couldn't paint. I realized I wasn't an artist. I was so angry I began to smash everything in the place."

A man, who the artist to this day does not know, came into the shop and gave him a hand.

"I told him I couldn't paint," Domiani said. "He told me to pick up the brush and try. I did. It was as if I had been painting for 50 years. I was amazed."

When Domiani looked up from his work to thank the stranger, he was gone.

"I searched everywhere for him," he said. "But I couldn't find him. Whoever the man was he changed the course of my life. I know there are people who are going to read this story and scoff at it, but those who have faith will understand."

After his first attempt at painting, Domiani decided to get more training with top artists of the time: Pasquale Manuelli, Carol Romanelli and

"I want to tell the true-life story of the American Indian. I want to show how he truly lived — the hardships and the triumphs."

—Thomas Domiani

Steven A. Gale. The three worked for movie studios building sets and other artwork.

"They all lived in Los Angeles," he said. "I studied with each of them."

It was through his friendship with Gale that Domiani got involved with the Pirates of the Caribbean ride and many other projects, including sculptures for the movie "A Conneticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court."

"We worked together for 25 years," said Domiani. "We worked for Warner Brothers, Paramount Pictures and all the other studios. He was one of my dearest friends and one of the greatest sculptors of our time."

It was also at that time that Domiani began crafting his Indian art.

Although he sculpted life-like Indian figures for many years, in 1979 Domiani decided to create an entire Indian village.

It took 10 years to complete the project. He spent hours doing research at the Bureau of Ethnology in Washington, D.C.

"I would often spend summers up in Montana with the Blackfeet Indians," he said. "I lived in teepees and did everything they did. To this day, I go out there."

More than 1,000 pieces make up the village. It is an exact replica of a typical working campsite of the plains Indians.

"The only problem is I built the village but I had nowhere to put it," he said. "I had put the horse before the cart. By the time it came around to buying the land, it had gone way up in price."

He hopes to find a home for his village soon. In the meantime, his 77 figures are stored in an Upland warehouse.

"I want to put it somewhere permanently so that all Americans can see how they really lived," he said. "Indians are a part of everyone's heritage whether it's fashion, names or ideas. Yet our government still keeps them on reservations. I've been on reservations and have seen how they live. This, to me, is the biggest disgrace of our nation.

"That's why I'm so interested in letting people know the truth about the Indian," he added.

Medical ethics placed at risk

By Diana E. Lundin

In the age of AIDS, physicians are finding themselves caught between protecting the privacy of their patients or breaching confidentiality for the public's welfare, said a governor of the American Board of Internal Medicine.

The relationship between patients and their doctors has traditionally been based on confidentiality, said Dr. Alan Gordon.

That confidentiality may be breached only for the public welfare. But as far as reporting and testing procedures for AIDS, physicians are "caught in a squeeze over individual civil rights and public welfare," Gordon said.

Frequently doctors are being sued for testing for AIDS without consent, not testing, informing patients they have the disease, or not informing spouses or other intimates, he said.

"It's a legal and ethical morass for physicians today," Gordon said at a medical ethics symposium last week at Claremont McKenna College.

While the oath of Hippocrates from the 5th century B.C. has lasted and still has meaning for doctors, ethical standards are being revised in the 1980s and '90s.

"With the issues of the '80s and '90s, how should we behave?" he said. "What is good and what is right today?"

The ancient Hippocratic oath is being challenged by the modern issues of allocation and rationing of medical resources, artificial insemination, in vitro fertilization, fetal research, organ transplants, confidentiality, and informed consent, among others, he said.

Today's physicians should be guided by four principles, Gordon said, naming beneficence, paternalism vs. autonomy, fidelity and justice as those principles.

Like the Hippocratic oath, a physician should do good and do no harm under the principle of beneficence, he said.

Gaps found in air-base report

By Richard Peraza

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Preliminary examination of Defense Department studies explaining how two San Bernardino County Air Force bases were targeted for closure reveals a series of "big holes" and omitted information, according to a spokesman for Rep. Jerry Lewis, R-Redlands.

"It's a blizzard of paper ... roughly 12,000 pages of documentation ... four inches thick." And yet, "We're finding there are big holes. Big chunks of information are missing, information that's useful and necessary to evaluate" the decision to close the bases, said David LeStrang, Lewis' press secretary.

Lewis was unavailable for comment last week and Rep. George E. Brown Jr., D-Riverside, said he would have no comment until after he's had more time to review the massive study delivered Feb. 7.

Both congressmen have been requesting the information used in deciding to close Norton Air Force Base in San Bernardino and George Air Force Base near Adelanto since the first of the year, when closure was recommended.

Norton is in Brown's district, George is in Lewis' district.

LeStrang said Lewis has a legislative analyst going over the document in detail, starting with the portion dealing with George.

"He's gotten through about a third," but is already dissatisfied, LeStrang said. "There is some information that is useful, however there is no comparable analyses of other tactical air bases."

Also missing are portions of the required environmental impact reports.

"You'll be reading along and find 20 pages missing. We don't know why it's missing. We think that's crucial information; that's the heart of the information we're looking at," LeStrang said.

A cover letter from Base Closure and Utilization Director Douglas Hansen notes, "Pre-decisional information, internal advice, recommendations and subjective opinions have been materials from the ponds and repair the liners but would not have required further hazardous waste cleanup.

Health officials protested the agreement as illegal and convinced the same superior court judge who approved the document to reverse it.

ChemWest appealed the reversal and had its day in court.

Although Robinson has not seen the decision yet, he said it appeared that the state has free reign to require either ChemWest or Kaiser to clean up the site. An investigation into the extent of contamination has yet to be conducted and cleanup measures could range from capping the ponds to total excavation of the slag pile.

Capping with a plastic liner has been estimated at $500,000 and removal of the slag could cost up to $200 million.

ChemWest's lease on the property expires in December and Kaiser plans to include the property in the 1,000-acre industrial park it hopes will replace the old steel mill.

Three days before it released the decision on the 1986 agreement, the court dismissed a companion case in which ChemWest appealed Miller's refusal to dismiss criminal action against the company. The dismissal had been a part of the agreement in exchange for $150,000, which has since been returned to the company.

removed. Classified information has also been removed.

"Additionally, information gathered about military bases reviewed ... but not closed or realigned has also been removed. This information is considered pre-decisional.

"Release of such information would harm the morale of military personnel and civilians assigned to these bases, and could adversely affect future funding at these bases for many years to come. Release of this information is not considered to be in the best interests of the United States Government."

"Clearly, there's going to be some national security information we won't have access to, that's understandable," LeStrang said. But it's hard to imagine much of the requested information falling into that category, he added.

"It's not acceptable to be a member of Congress, to make a very valid request to evaluate this material and come to some sort of clear understanding of why the bases were chosen ... and be denied that access," LeStrang said.

Lewis first requested the information from Defense Secretary Frank Carlucci, then he and Brown turned to the General Accounting Office when no studies were provided.

The GAO recently agreed to probe the study findings, but the analysis was not pried loose.

In an act of desperation, Lewis filed for the documents under provisions of the Freedom of Information Act.

"We're asking why aren't we able to get the information we need to do the study we need to do. We're still looking for answers," LeStrang said.

And patients have the right to accept or reject treatment after they have been informed of the consequences of their decisions, he said.

The principle of justice means a physician treats all patients without regard to their ability to pay while under the fidelity principle, the doctor should act as the patient's advocate, having a duty to the patient and no other. But medicine is increasingly being covered by a corporate umbrella, which in many instances seeks to contain the costs of treating ill or injured patients by rationing care.

Insurance companies used to ask for specific information about patients, Gordon said. Now insurers ask patients to sign a piece of paper giving them a free rein to look at all of their medical records.

"The patient doesn't know what he's signed," he said.

And in the case of doctors employed by health maintenance organizations Gordon asks, "Who is his (the physician's) master? His employer or patient?"

Gordon gave these examples of medical situations and the ethical dilemmas they pose:

- A 46-year-old man is under long-term mental care and tells his psychiatrist that he wants to kill his boss. Should the psychiatrist call the police or maintain the man's confidentiality?

- A 38-year-old woman grants permission to her insurance company to examine her prior medical records, which contain references to the woman's unusual sexual practices. Should the doctor release the records?

- A 32-year-old female surgeon fears she'll be infected by a patient with the AIDS virus from a cut she may receive from surgery. Can she ethically refuse to perform the operation on the patient who needs surgery?

- That same doctor, who is pregnant, encounters a patient who has German measles, which is known to cause birth defects. Can she refuse to treat that patient?

Rail transit funding endorsed

By staff and wire reports

SACRAMENTO — A group of state lawmakers last week proposed a $1.5 billion state rail bond act that would include funding for a commuter rail project between San Bernardino and Los Angeles.

"This measure will benefit everyone in the state because it will result in cleaner air, less energy use, more transportation options and less crowding on our overcrowded streets and highways," Assemblyman Jim Costa, D-Fresno, said at a Capitol news conference.

He said he will introduce a bill in a few weeks that would put such a bond issue on the June 1990 ballot.

State Sen. Ruben Ayala, D-Chino, who will be the principal co-author of the legislation in the Senate, was optmistic about the legislation's chances of passing.

Ayala has been a major proponent of the San Bernardino-Los Angeles line, which also would serve Rialto, Fontana, Rancho Cucamonga, Upland, Claremont, Pomona and San Dimas.

However, the several hundred million dollars deemed necessary to start up the line has been a major stumbling block in its development.

"I think it (the bond act) would do an adequate job of funding the commuter train from San Bernardino to Los Angeles," said Ayala.

Jerry Meral of the Planning and Conservation League said he is backing Costa's proposal and at the same time preparing an initiative that would do the same thing if the Legislature fails to act.

The measure would allow the state to sell $1.5 billion in general obligation bonds, which would be repaid from state tax dollars with interest over 20 years.

The money would be distributed around the state, on a population basis by counties, for passenger rail capital projects such as purchase of rail cars, acquisition of right-of-way, improvements to tracks and construction of stations.
